The editor of the student newspaper at the University of Wisconsin-Madison, who was recently arrested for violating a university rule, has been granted a temporary restraining order by the American Civil Liberties Union.

The ACLU said it had granted a temporary restraining order to the student newspaper at the University of Wisconsin-Madison, which was recently arrested for violating a university rule.

The rule, which prohibits the publication of material that is deemed to be hate speech, was lifted by the university's administration.

The student newspaper had published an article critical of the university's administration, which had been embroiled in a controversy over its handling of a hate speech incident.

The ACLU said it would continue to monitor the situation and would consider taking further action if necessary.
